About a year ago, in the depths of winter, a young college student left a party in a village near the small town in New Hampshire in which I live to walk to his parents' house a couple of miles away. Foolishly – for it was dark and he had been drinking – he decided to take a shortcut through the woods. He never made it.

5 The next day when his disappearance became known hundreds of volunteers took to the woods to search for him. They searched for days, but without success. It wasn't until spring that someone walking in the woods stumbled on his body.

10 Five weeks ago, something broadly similar happened. A small private jet with two people aboard had to abort its approach as it came in to land at our local airport in poor weather. As the pilot swung round to the northeast to make a new approach, he radioed his intentions to the control tower.

A moment later the little green blip that was his plane disappeared from the airport radar screen. Somewhere out there, abruptly and for reasons unknown, the plane came down in the woods.

15 Again a large-scale search was mounted, this time with a dozen planes and eleven helicopters augmenting more than 200 volunteer searchers on the ground. Again they searched for days, and again without luck. (...) The plane had simply vanished without trace.

20 I don't mean to imply that we live on the edge of some kind of Bermuda triangle of the deciduous world, merely that the woods of New Hampshire are a rather strange and sinister place.

To begin with they are full of trees – and I don't mean that as a joke. I spent some weeks last summer hiking in these woods and I can tell you that the one thing you see in numbers beyond imagining is trees. At times it's actually unsettling because it is essentially just one endlessly repeated scene. Every bend in the path presents a prospect indistinguishable from every other, and it remains like that no matter how far you go. (...) New Hampshire is as big as Wales and is 85 per cent forest. There's a lot of forest out there to get lost in. Every year at least one or two people on foot go missing, sometimes never to be seen again.

25 Yet here's a remarkable thing. Until only about a century ago, and less than that in some areas, most of these woods didn't exist. Nearly the whole of rural New England – including all the area around our part of New Hampshire – was open, meadowy farmland. (...) The farms disappeared because the farmers moved west, to richer lands in places like Illinois and Ohio, or moved to the burgeoning industrial cities, where earnings were more reliable and generous. The farms they left behind – and sometimes the villages that supported them – sank into the ground and gradually returned to wilderness.
