It is exactly midnight, which means Mother's Day has just begun. I stayed overnight with my mother in the apartment in Sutton Place where I grew up. She is down the hall in her room, and together we are keeping the vigil¹. The same vigil we've kept every year since my brother, Charles MacKenzie Jr, "Mack", walked out of the apartment he shared with two
5 other Columbia University seniors ten years ago. He has never been seen since. But every year at some point on Mother's Day, he calls to assure Mom he is fine. "Don't worry about me," he tells her. "One of these days I'll turn the key in the lock and be home." Then he hangs up.

We never know when in those twenty-four hours that call will come. Last year Mack called 10 at a few minutes after midnight, and our vigil ended almost as soon as it began. Two years ago he waited until the last second to phone, and Mom was frantic that this slim contact with him was over.

Mack has to have known that my father was killed in the Twin Towers tragedy. I was sure that no matter what he was doing, that terrible day would have compelled him to come home.
15 But it did not. Then on the next Mother's Day, during his annual call, he started crying and gasped, "I'm sorry about Dad. I'm really sorry," and broke the connection.

I am Carolyn. I was sixteen when Mack disappeared. Following in his footsteps, I attended Columbia. Unlike him, I then went on to Duke Law School. Mack had been accepted there before he disappeared. After I passed the Bar² last year I clerked for a civil court judge in the courthouse on Centre Street, in lower Manhattan. The judge has just retired, so at the moment
20 I'm unemployed. I plan to apply for a job, but not quite yet.

First, I must find a way to track my brother down. What happened to him? Why did he disappear? There was no sign of foul play. Mack's credit cards were not used. His car was in the garage near the apartment. No one of his description ended up in the morgue. (...)

The ring of the phone made me bolt up. I saw that it was five minutes to three. With one hand 25 I snapped on the bedside light and with the other grabbed the receiver. Mom had already picked up, and I heard her voice, breathless and nervous.

"Hello, Mack."

"Hello, Mom. Happy Mother's Day. I love you."
